Biographical / Historical

Between 1976 and 1993, the Ford Foundation invested more than $30 million in support of community forestry programs under the Rural Poverty and Resources Program. Two major goals of the program were to 1.) reduce poverty among people living in rural areas and 2.) improve the management of natural resources. This work required building relationships with nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) as well as government forest departments with jurisdiction over public lands. The program aimed to give people who rely on forests for their livelihood to have a voice in how forests are managed. In the 1980s and 1990s, the Ford Foundation established community forestry programs in the Philippines, India, Thailand, Indonesia, China, and Bangladesh.
